In the movie of our lives, this is a Moment to Remember.
It is a flashback to a realization, the capital letters audible.
Four women in a diner,
smoke blue around our ears, coffee in cozy brown mugs, we lean forward.
Elbows on table, we smile to keep from screaming, knowing the stale problems we discuss will never change, knowing
we are hardening,
lines settling around
our eyes.
Not My Life

Not your day, huh?
My boss looks at me with hat askew, coat half off my shoulder. I nod, stuff my overfull satchel into my cubby, fume.
Not my day, no, it’s really not going so well. In fact, I could say it’s not my week, month or year. This existence is not my life, can’t be.

My life has run off, joined the circus, wears spangled pink leotards and gold lipstick.
She performs high wire acrobatics, smiling hugely all the while. This life that has moved into her place wears gray, can’t even stomach the drama of all black. The imposter tries to pace the high wire but can’t keep her balance.

I imagine placing personal ads, seeking a new life, one that giggles and flips her healthy hair. This one bathes infrequently and stringy hair doesn’t suit me.
I plaster milk cartons with her picture,
offer rewards, make a missing persons report to an indifferent officer. I miss her, am tired of walking alone, falling off the thin wire I walk, boring myself to tears.
